Shelburne native Patrick Keeler first got into acting by joining Basement Theatre in his hometown at the age of 12 years old. Cast as “Linus” in the show You’re a Good Man, Charlie Brown, he found his passion for theatre, which he now hopes to turn into a career.

Patrick pursued his love for theatre across the pond in the UK, where he recently finished up a Masters in Professional Acting at the Bristol Old Vic Theatre School. This was an intensive one-year program that focused on all aspects of performance, from acting, singing and dancing to accents and dialects, stage combat and more.

He is drawn to theatre, because he feels when it is performed well, it can be “one of the most powerful ways to affect people and tell a story”. He adds that each theatrical piece is different, as is each performance of the same piece. His favourite part of acting is the special kind of relationship between actors and their audience, and an actor’s ability to “play” with an audience and respond to their feedback.

Patrick plans to move to London after he graduates and to make a living in theatre there.
